Introduction

I am writing about this idea and combination of ideologies because I came across it on the internet as a joke. However, when I started thinking about it, the question that interested me was whether at least in purely theoretical terms some internally consistent version of it could exist.

Please do not take this text as a description of a realistically implementable model nor as a professional philosophical-economic work; I am neither an economist nor a philosopher.

I am writing this text as a personal project because I have been interested in the DPRK and the Juche ideology for several years, and recently also in anarcho-capitalism and the Austrian school of economics. I am mainly interested in whether seemingly incompatible ideologies can be combined into one theoretical model and where such a model would encounter its internal contradictions.

I would also like to emphasize that this text is not support for the DPRK regime or the Juche ideology. On the contrary, I reject totalitarian regimes and human rights violations. The goal of this work is only to explore one unconventional idea as an intellectual experiment.

Basic Characteristics of Individual Ideologies

I would first like to describe all the ideologies contained in this text from an economic and social perspective.

I do this because the ideologies appear to strongly contradict each other at first glance, e.g. Juche x Anarchism, Capitalism x Syndicalism etc., and I would like the reader to first understand the individual ideologies on their own, and then be able to understand my idea and my strongly theoretical model.

National Syndicalism

National syndicalism is a politico-economic direction that began to develop in Europe already at the turn of the 19th and 20th centuries, more so in the 20th century.

Among the main political pioneers of this ideology was José Antonio Primo de Rivera, who used its elements in Spain in his ideology, which he called falangism (often associated with Benito Mussolini's fascism).

The main idea is that the economy should be organized through workers' syndicates (organizations of workers), or through professions that would have a significant role in managing production and economic decision-making.

However, there is one main difference from classical socialist syndicalism, where national syndicalism places a strong emphasis on the unity of the nation and a strong national state as a whole.

Juche

Juche is the state ideology of the DPRK, whose roots begin in the second half of the 1940s. The main pioneer was Kim Il-sung, who is also considered the founder of the independent state of North Korea. Kim Il-sung took power in North Korea on 9 September 1948, when Juche was not yet fully developed. Its formation occurred between 1955 and 1960, still under Kim Il-sung's rule.

The ideology is based mainly on a strong role of the state and a single ruling party, and is historically associated with communism. The basic idea of Juche is that the state (and its people) should be able to function independently of external influences, both in politics and in the economy. Emphasis is placed on strong centralized leadership and unity of society. In practice, Juche is associated with a very strong role of the state, central planning of the economy, and an ideological emphasis on loyalty to the state leadership, which is historically linked to the Kim family.

Anarcho-Capitalism

Anarcho-capitalism is a politico-economic theory that emerged in the second half of the 20th century. One of the first people who began to systematically develop this idea was Murray Newton Rothbard. Among his first works where AnCap was clearly defined is the work Power and Market.

The main idea is a society without a state, which is governed solely by the market, including police, courts, healthcare, defense, etc. This idea strongly criticizes the tax system, functions mainly on private ownership, and advocates the complete removal of the state and the replacement of all its functions with the private sector and voluntary contracts between individuals.

The ideology is based on the non-aggression principle (NAP), which states that no form of violence or coercion is legitimate unless it is a reaction to defense against aggression.

Summary

National Syndicalism – Left-wing to center-wing authoritarian ideology with emphasis on the state as a whole and an economic model similar to fascism/falangism.

Juche – Left authoritarian ideology with emphasis on a single ruling party, independent state and absolute power of the leader, with an economic model derived from communism.

Anarcho-Capitalism – Right-wing libertarian theory whose goal is the complete removal of the state and its replacement by the private sector, with a purely market economy on the principle of laissez-faire.

Where the Individual Ideologies Oppose Each Other

In this part, I would like to discuss where and how the individual ideologies oppose each other, since they mutually exclude each other in many fundamental points, especially in questions of the role of the state, the economic system and the concept of ownership.

Role of the State

I would start with this point, because here the ideologies of Juche and national syndicalism are quite close, but with the difference that Juche counts on an extremely strong centralized state that has full control over political and social life, unlike national syndicalism, where its role is more connected with a corporative or professional organization of society through syndicates.

However, the similarities end here, because anarcho-capitalism on the other hand strives for a society completely without a state, where its functions are replaced by private sectors and market competition. The state is understood here as an unnecessary monopoly on violence.

Economic System

In this point, Juche and national syndicalism are again partially close, but not as much. Juche is based on a centrally planned economy, where the state decides on production, distribution and economic goals. Emphasis is placed on self-sufficiency and minimizing dependence on the outside world.

In national syndicalism, elements of state management and organization of the economy are implemented through professional or workers' syndicates. The economy is therefore neither purely market nor fully planned, but is managed by a corporative system under state supervision.

Anarcho-capitalism stands here on a completely opposite principle. The economy is purely market-based, private ownership forms its basis and the entire system functions on the principle of laissez-faire.

Ownership

Here the differences between the individual ideologies begin to manifest significantly. Juche prefers predominantly state ownership with strong state control. National syndicalism combines collective ownership and state management of the economy. Anarcho-capitalism on the other hand advocates exclusively private ownership.

Power and Control of Society

Here the ideologies of Juche and national syndicalism are again very close. Juche places emphasis on ideological unity and loyalty to the state leadership. National syndicalism prefers national unity and the suppression of class conflicts. At its core, it is a fairly similar principle, where everything is enforced by police and courts, even by violence if necessary.

Anarcho-capitalism on the other hand rejects central ideological control and is based on individual freedom of the individual.

Summary

Based on the previous analysis, it can be said that the individual ideologies oppose each other quite a lot and differ significantly in principle. However, it can be said that Juche and national syndicalism are close in some respects and are not complete opposites like anarcho-capitalism.

From this, it can be understood that these ideologies are three different models that are, however, partially similar in some aspects.

How to Combine Different Ideologies Together

Although these theories can be understood as completely different, upon longer reflection intersections can be found where a hypothetical model can be proposed.

Let's look at that now:

For Juche and anarchic elements from anarcho-capitalism, a hypothetical model can be proposed where we abolish the government as such and at the head of the country there will be only a monarch (in this case a blood heir of the government from the Kim family). Citizens of this state will have a wide degree of personal and economic freedom only within this state, which is limited by laws, similar to how it would be in anarcho-capitalism, but they would additionally protect the monarchy and state ideology. However, in order for it to still align with Juche principles, it is necessary for the laws to state that citizens must not criticize the monarch, his family and ancestors. At the same time, citizens could not leave the territory of the state. The media would also be free, with the exception that they must not criticize the regime and the monarch.

At this moment, it is a hypothetical system that can be called a hybrid of Juche and anarchism with significant elements of anarcho-capitalism. However, this may rather resemble anarcho-monarchism, but that is not entirely true. Anarcho-monarchism is often defined, as far as state authority is concerned, as a "voluntarily recognized institution without coercive powers or as purely symbolic authority". However, this definition cannot be applied to the hybrid system described here.

National syndicalism and Juche, these two ideologies are quite economically close, but there are gaps between them. However, both can be understood as ideologies that emphasize the unity of the population, a strong economic role of the state, and economic equality of citizens. Therefore, they can be combined into one hypothetical model. However, if we want to add anarcho-capitalism, it may seem seemingly impossible. But when we take the idea of national syndicalism and Juche and add a free market system to them, something like a hypothetical system can be proposed where there is a market, companies and "private" ownership, but with the difference that none of this is owned by individuals who employ other citizens for a fixed wage, but by workers who divide the company's earnings equally among all. For example: a smaller company with 10 employees earns 20,000 dollars, each of the employees gets 2,000 dollars. Therefore, it can be said that it is no longer so much private ownership, but rather collective ownership. The management of these companies would be carried out collectively, not by a few individuals. These companies would be established collectively and would compete with each other on the market.

However, if we want to preserve the idea of Juche, where everyone has the right to education, healthcare, police services etc., it can be proposed that a fixed part of the company's profit would be paid to the monarch, who would provide all the above with this money.

Therefore, it can be said that the monarch is not a completely symbolic head of state, but a person who also performs functions that would otherwise be performed by the government, but only to a very limited extent.

It should be emphasized that the presented model is not an attempt at a literal combination of individual ideologies, but represents a new hypothetical system inspired by selected elements of each of them. Some original principles of the individual ideologies are therefore consciously modified or abandoned in favor of maintaining the internal consistency of the model.

Housing

If we want to talk about the area of housing, all ideologies have significant differences here.

Juche – housing is allocated by the state.

Syndicalism – housing has collective/corporative management.

AnCap – housing is arranged by the individual himself and is his private property.

If we want to find a hypothetical model that can be applied, the simplest will be to use the idea where housing will have collective management and will be owned by all owners of the company. The management will also be carried out by all owners of the company, so they themselves will decide whether they want to build, for example, one large panelák for everyone in the company, or whether they want a residence where everyone will have “their” house.

It can therefore be said that at this moment the state would have no say regarding housing.

Final Summary of the Ideology

Based on the previous hypothesis, it can be said that it would be an ideology that is libertarian with authoritarian features. People have personal and economic freedom, but only to a certain extent, and to the extent that it does not interfere with criticism of the regime and the leader of the state.

Economically, it can be said that it uses elements of syndicalism and capitalism in one, so it cannot be defined as either right-wing or left-wing. It could therefore be said that it is a center-right to centrist ideology, with features of libertarianism and authoritarianism at the same time.

It cannot be called purely libertarian, because it still recognizes the authority of the leader, and at the same time companies must pay mandatory contributions.

Law would be enforceable by state police and courts, but without the use of violence unless it is necessary to use it.

It can therefore be said that the ideology would function on the principle of non-aggression (NAP) and voluntariness of all participants. This means that no one can be forced into legal relationships, nor forced to remain in them if a contract between the two parties does not state so. And certainly cannot be forced to anything by violence.

Conclusion

In conclusion, it is good to state that this work/essay serves as a theoretical and hypothetical model and a possible combination of these ideologies together. I myself do not agree with various practices and the same applies to the ideologies as such. This essay serves as a thought experiment that combines seemingly contradictory ideologies.

I would like to state again that I am not a political scientist, philosopher or economist, but just a person who is interested in these topics, and this just seemed like an interesting topic to me. I am only a high school student, so I do not want this theory to be taken as something usable or finished.
